Dr. Barbara Barlow, the 2001 recipient of the Foundation's Renaissance Award, is well known for her work in saving the lives of children through prevention. She founded the “Children Can't Fly” program in Harlem, followed by the Harlem Hospital Injury Prevention Program funded by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. This program, a collaboration of hospital, physicians, industry and community, provides safety education and the creation of safe zones for children. The program has been duplicated in Philadelphia, Kansas City, Dallas, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Los Angeles, Atlanta and Chicago. Dr. Barlow is an inspiring leader and speaker.

The Foundation for the History of Women In Medicine was founded in 1998 with the mission “to insure the preservation and conservation of materials and artifacts pertaining to the history of women in medicine and to provide opportunities to promote the study and advancement of the history of women in medicine and the medical sciences.”
